Tribe. The Haliwa-Saponi Indian people number over 4,000 enrolled members and are descendants of the Saponi, Nansemond, Tuscarora, and some other regional tribes. During the English colonial era, these tribes maintained autonomous villages in what is now northeastern North Carolina and southern Virginia. The Saponi Indians, an eastern Sioux-speaking tribe, were first encountered by colonists on the Staunton (or Roanoke) River in Virginia around 1670.

The Haliwa Indians were recognized as a tribe by the North Carolina legislature in 1965. The tribal name is a combination of Halifax and Warren Counties, where the majority of the Haliwa live. One tradition relates that the present Indian communities in this area were founded by wounded survivors of the Tuscarora War and other colonial conflicts who were unable to rejoin their original tribal groups.

The Saponi or Sappony are a Native American tribe historically based in the Piedmont of North Carolina and Virginia. They spoke the Siouan Tutelo-Saponi language, which was related to the languages of the Tutelo, Occaneechi, Monacan, Manahoac and other eastern Siouan peoples. Since the mid-20th century, certain groups in the Southeast have organized to assert their American Indian cultural identity; some claim descent from the historic Sappony. Among them are the Haliwa-Saponi, and the Occaneech
